

Young girls consider having plastic surgery

Contributed by David Castillo

According to a new study, young women between the ages of 11-21 consider having plastic surgery.

The study, which was conducted in the United Kingdom, concluded that girls as young as 10-years-old are concerned about their figure. More than 20 percent of girls between ages 16 to 21 said they'd consider having plastic surgery done, while twelve percent of girls between ages 11 to 16 said that they would consider it and five percent said they would get Botox injections.

Experts say that idealized female images from the advertisements are putting pressure on young girls—making them strive for an appearance that is unattainable.

Source: The Plastic Surgery Channel